[COMMUNICATED.]

THE PASSIONS.—By J. B. Johnson.

The objects which external Nature presents to our contemplation are distributed into three kingdoms, the Animal, the Vegetable and the Mineral. While it is not always easy to assign the lines of demarcation which separate these kingdoms, there is no perplexity in placing man first on the list of the one to which he belongs. This is his moral position; and he occupies this place of supremacy in consequence of possessing attributes which are not enjoyed by any other animal. These attributes are comprehended in the term human; and while man can descend to the level of brutes, brutes can never descend themselves of their characteristics, and ascend to his level. This particular entitles him to the claim of being a superior animal, and accords the advantages which he craves over animate and inanimate creation. Brutes are controlled by instinct and memory. Man not only by instinct and memory, but by reason; and this, expresses in its comprehensive sound, the superiority which he holds over the beasts of the field, the fishes of the sea, and the birds of the air. Reason is his boast; and it is this ray of light from the effulgence of the great eternal, that makes man the being that he is, and as-attributes him to the God who formed him. Hence, in comparison with other animals, man is worthy of the best care, and the noblest preservation. Around him are the substantial toils of existence, and before him, the spell of an undefined future. Each breath shortens his tenure upon earth, and every act which he performs, becomes the annalist of what he has done, and the index of that which he will be likely to do. He commits no act by chance; and all his movements are dictated by motives that are the direct issue of inherent or extraneous agents, which make their impressions in accordance with the tone of the desire to be subserved, and the Passion to be obeyed.

The passions are instinctive; and can be increased or diminished by education, but can never be so subdued as to be inactive. Their presence is necessary to conduct the operations of the mind, and to direct the motions of the body; and they support the same characteristics in every human being. Their sameness, clearness and strength, render it an impossible task to follow them to any other source than that of an innate one, and demonstrate beyond peradventure, the co-existence of them with the human species. They stand in the same relation to the brain, that the senses do to the body; and frequently act in matters of pleasure or pain, in obedience to the senses. Many disquisitions have been produced in regard to the origin and number of them; and some authors describe ten, others five, and five ungrateful; but from a rigorous investigation, it will be found that very likely, their number is but five; for this number strictly harmonizes with that of the senses; and the reciprocal action which is ever found to exist between the passions and the senses, invites the conclusion that each sense has its passion to enforce its command and attain its objects. Love, Hope, Fear, Grief and Hatred, are, in all likelihood, all the Passions. They rarely act separately, but most generally conjointly; and when they act in combination with each other, that multitude of emotions and affections is elicited which constitutes human nature. The affections are the result of association; and are the issue of the process which is superinduced by the impressions which the senses make upon the mind, and which are necessary to protect the body in the enjoyment of ease, or in the prevention of pain. Hence, the Senses, the Passions, the Emotions and the Affections are engaged in every act. The senses communicate to the brain, their demands, and excite the passions. The emotions are the visible effects of the passions, and the affections are those feelings which inspire the whole power, mental and physical, to possess or repel an object, and are augmented or diminished by the degree to which reason has been cultivated.

Man cannot avoid the passions if he make the utmost effort to do so. They are not just as inevitable as thought. If he were not directed by a wise influence of them, he would be a mere automaton, and the victim of every impulse. There would always exist a void in his heart, were it not filled by beings of their creation; and were it not for their presence, he would have nothing superior in his intercourse with his kind, to that which mark the relation of the brutes. It is therefore, their abuse that is reprehensible, and not their judicious use; for a reasonable exercise of the passions ensures not only the enjoyment of the good of life, but secures the possession of it.

When the action of the Senses puts the Passions in operation, the physical effect which is produced, is too apparent to be mistaken. When the mind is apparently affected, the whole animal economy expands under its influence. The brow broadens, the nostrils dilate, the lips part in graceful ease, and every feature brightens with a smile. The respiration is light and free, and the whole frame assumes the vigor of fresh life. The radiance of the countenance gives a joyous hue to every object, and life's toils seem but the wishes of complacency. But when the mind is unpleasantly affected, the opposite condition is observed. The brow is contracted, the nostrils are pinched, the eyes glare with intense flashes of heated earnestness, and the whole exterior is controlled by undisguised perturbation. The features wear a scowl, and are overshadowed by a sullen expression that casts its somber shade upon all objects, and renders them dark and repulsive. The duties of life are performed with irksomeness, and the sweetest good of the world is carelessly mingled with its bitterest evil. Thus the difference is well marked; for habitual good-humor brightens the face with the glow of a sunbeam, enlivens the energies, and disposes to kind sentiments. It gives cheerfulness to every care of life, and envelops an individual in a buoyancy of disposition that makes him appear as though he breathed an atmosphere perpetually tempered with the softening influence of flowers. Habitual ill-temper produces gloom, moroseness and maliciousness. It throws around an individual the cast of darkness, and causes him to appear as though he had been continually subjected to an influence that induces him to speak despondingly of life, and to feel towards his companions, a disregard for their kindness, and a disrespect for their efforts to serve him. He is constantly finding fault. Nothing goes aright, and no one pleases him. His physical organization soon catches the condition of his mind, and sinking into premature senility, he becomes disgusted with life, and a burden to himself.
